Memorable influences or life experiences: The often quoted phrase we heard so frequently from Daddy Don, “Into every life a little rain must fall” (from Longfellow), remains a precious memory that continually influences and sustains our family. The Don T. Adams translation meant, “Stop complaining, and get up and go on down the road.” Don’s comparatively short life impacted most everything and everyone he touched. People still offer comforting and encouraging stories of how he made a difference in their lives and in their community. Maybe the most significant impact he made was to his family in preparing us to become strong, independent, and self-sufficient. We were introduced to the work ethic at an early age and were continually challenged to give our best to every task. So even though we felt deluged by his death, we knew exactly what was expected of us and have managed to “go on down the road” remembering that “a little rain must fall,” yet confident that often times a rainbow will follow the rain and leave a silver lining in a cloud.
